- These results are interpreted as suggesting that negative emotional IELs (e.g., IELs that report their brands contain a warning, or comments like "avoiding products like X, recent findings") are more likely to be associated with negative brand attitudes than their positive counterparts.
- Comments that praise and show positive product benefits are more likely to be associated with positive brand attitudes.
- More and personal brands that are recommended generate positive comments.
- There were no significant any linear associations between brands with emotional target face valence.
- The use of optical asymmetries within their positive (i.e., smiling) faces.

Abstract: In this paper, we study the asymptotic behavior of the spectral density of the sample autocorrelation function of a stationary process. We show that the spectral density of the sample autocorrelation function converges to the spectral density of the process in the L^2 -norm. This result is a generalization of the result of Parzen (1969) for the spectral density of the sample autocorrelation function of a stationary process. We also show that the spectral density of the sample autocorrelation function converges to the spectral density of the process in the L^2 -norm. This result is a generalization of the result of Parzen (1969) for the spectral density of the sample autocorrelation function of a stationary process.
