

High School Vs College: Compare and Contrast

There are many challenges in life that will test us as we get older, school becomes a big part of our lives and we are pressured to do well. All these years of school is meant to prepare us for college and from there, it's on to the real world. Although college is simply one step above high school, there are many differences between the lives of high school vs college students. College vs high school differ greatly in their economical, personal, and social aspects, which will be discussed in this essay.

The biggest change between high school and college are the freshman years. In college, students have much more independence than they've ever had in high school. Moving away from their families and in with some strangers they've never met before may seem like a bad thing but this is an experience that will teach a new college student how to deal with conflicts, and prepare them for the real world. The excitement and pressure of the first day of college brings a student back to their high school years. The first day of freshman year makes a student feel like they're in the wrong place, it wouldn't be a normal first day of school if you didn't get lost looking for classes.

A big part of school is time management. All of the long nights and countless mornings waking up at 5AM puts a toll on students. In high school you can expect to spend around 40 hours inside of class and are required by law to attend 5 days a week.

Students are expected to learn most of the information in class and learn at the same rate of all your classmates. In college, however you can expect to spend almost half that time in the classroom. As a college student, one will only spend about 15-18 hours per week in class, at first this might seem great but there's always a catch. With each class ranging from 60 minutes to 1 hour 30 minutes.
