The starfish is a member of the phylum Echinodermata. This phylum is characterized by a five-fold rotational symmetry, a water-vascular system with numerous openings through the epidermis, and a central nervous system with many star-shaped ganglia. The central nervous system consists of a central brain, several lateral ganglia, and a series of radial nerves. The starfish has a five-fold rotational symmetry, and its body is divided into five main parts: the central disk, the arms, the aboral surface, the oral surface, and the ventral surface. The starfish has a central disk, which is the main body of the animal. The arms are attached to the central disk and are used for locomotion and feeding. The aboral surface is the top of the starfish, and the oral surface is the bottom. The ventral surface is the side of the starfish that is closest to the ground.
