Abstract: This study examined the relationship between parenting and young children's (3-5 years) internalizing and externalizing problems. Data were collected from 100 mothers and their children in a community sample. The findings indicated that mothers' parenting practices were related to children's internalizing and externalizing problems. Specifically, mothers' use of physical punishment was related to children's internalizing and externalizing problems. Mothers' use of psychological control was related to children's internalizing problems. Mothers' use of positive parenting was related to children's externalizing problems. The findings suggest that mothers' use of physical punishment and psychological control may be related to children's internalizing and externalizing problems. The findings also suggest that mothers' use of positive parenting may be related to children's externalizing problems.

As a result, the authors have not yet investigated several questions that remain unanswered. First, if the results of this study are taken literally, they suggest that the full impact of the program has not been achieved and needs to be supported through highway. These concepts are addressed in the appendix to a policy research on special federal-aid money project (also available as a technical report) by the authors (see Ref. 10).
