

Catoctin Furnace Iron Trail

From Mules to Motors

"[The ore] is loaded on tram cars and hauled by locomotives to the washers, which are located on the east side of the Emmitsburg Road...a sidetrack from the Frederick Railroad runs under the washers, and as the ore comes from them, it is dumped into cars ready for shipment."

© Joseph Stewart, copyright, printing the book, University of Virginia, published September 1900.

The stones you see here once supported a small but busy railroad that ran between the ore pits and the furnace. The Catoctin Furnace Railroad, nicknamed the Orey Railroad, was a narrow gauge railroad powered by an 80 horsepower steam engine. It hauled iron ore out of the mines and to the furnace, stopping along the way to wash the ore in Little Hunting Creek. The railway could move large amounts of ore over long distances, a much more efficient solution than the earlier system of mule-driven carts. Steam-powered technology, like the railway, changed the operations of the furnace forever. Picture the mule carts, and then the railroad running through the woods where you now stand. How might the landscape have looked, smelled, and sounded different?

Illustration on left page of Frederick County shows the Orey Railway line referred to as the "Orey Railroad" running from the upper Orey Mine in the north to the furnace in the south. A smaller line also ran north to south on the east of the Orey Mine.

Small Orey Mine located just east of the Orey Mine. In the bottom right is a picture of a mule-drawn cart. The text on the right side of the page says that the mule-drawn cart was used to haul the ore from the mine to the furnace.
