

What is a Research Question?

A research question guides and controls your research. It should be clear and focused, as well as specific enough to permit your teacher approval. Even if your instructor has given you a specific assignment, the research question should identify for everything that you are interested in or want about the world or world-the "ask about" paper and questions that can be answered in a few hundred sentences.

Examples:

1. For instance, the following question is too broad and does not follow the requirements of the analysis:

Why did the Vietnam war end?

(The question does not address which theories or which war.)

2. Similarly, the following question could be answered by a hypothetical Internet search:

How many children were killed during the Vietnam War, in February of 1968?

(Similarly, this question could be answered in one sentence and does not have much to analyze. It could, however, become more for a larger assignment.)

3. A better research question might be the following:

What are some of the environmental factors that occurred in Vietnam during and following the Vietnam War?

(This question can lead to the author taking a stand on which factors are significant, and allows the writer to argue in what degree the results are beneficial or detrimental.)

How do You Formulate a Good Research Question?

There is a general rule of thumb, and several preliminary questions, on this page to assist you in formulating a good research question. These will help determine what kinds of questions the topic generates.

Once you have considered preliminary questions, consider: What is the problem? Is it a problem? Why? Is it a problem? Why? Is it a problem? Why? (These are the preliminary questions that will help you determine "What?" "Why?" and "How?" questions. They include possible responses to these questions.)
