An Overview of Geologic Time	14

Earth is a unique place, home to millions of organisms, including ourselves. No other planet we've yet discovered has the same delicate balance of conditions necessary to sustain life. Geology is the science that studies Earth: how it was born, how it evolved, how it works, and how we can help preserve its habitats for life. Geologists try to answer many questions about Earth's surface and interior. Why do the continents expose dry land? Why are the oceans so deep? How did the Himalaya, Alps, and Rocky Mountains reach their great heights? What process generated island chains such as Hawaii in the middle of the Pacific Ocean and the deep trenches near the ocean's margins? More generally, how does the face of our planet change over time, and what forces drive these changes? We think you will find the answers to these questions quite fascinating—they will allow you to look at the world around you with new eyes. Welcome to the science of geology!

We have organized the discussion of geology in this book around three basic concepts that will appear in almost every chapter: (1) Earth as a system of interacting components, (2) plate tectonics as a unifying theory of geology, and (3) changes in the Earth system through geologic time.

This chapter gives a broad picture of how geologists think. It starts with the scientific method, the observational approach to the physical universe on which all scientific inquiry is based. Throughout the book, you will see the scientific method in action as you discover how Earth scientists gather and interpret information about our planet. In this first chapter, we will illustrate how the scientific method was applied to discover some of Earth's basic features—its shape and internal layering.

We will also introduce you to a geologist's view of time. You may start to think about time differently as you begin to comprehend the immense span of geologic history. Earth and the other planets in our solar system formed about 4.5 billion years ago. More than 3 billion years ago, living cells developed on Earth's surface, and life has been evolving ever since. Yet our human origins date back only a few million years—a mere few hundredths of a percent of Earth's existence. The scales that measure individual lives in decades and
