7. Supply and demand for labor: The labor market is not a simple one-way street. While firms hire workers, workers also supply labor. The labor market is a two-sided market. The demand for labor is derived from the demand for the final product. The supply of labor is determined by the number of workers who are willing to work at a given wage. The labor market is a competitive market. Firms hire workers until the marginal product of labor equals the wage. Workers supply labor until the wage equals the marginal cost of labor.
