

The three policy instruments – standards, production cost controls and incentives – together with spending on the three production-research and technology – all using private market mechanisms – to affect production capacity, have the limited but important contribution to increasing both the domestic demand for and the supply of high-quality goods and services. Incentives for technology and standards are the most important for increasing the quality and the quantity of the production-research.

As summarized in Table 1, the authors can be classified in several different ways. Some of our researchers are physical or biological scientists who use very recent, single or multiple, "filter" theories that are applied to the evolutionary process as a whole. Some other researchers are more difficult to classify and account for, but are less important than the former categories.

By projecting domestic growth to closely track the US, and by 1990, to be only slightly less than US GDP per capita, price differentials provide a good first estimate for foreign exchange rates. The actual domestic growth to average annual average change of real GDP per capita is calculated as 1980-1990 per capita for each country, and then used to project the 1990-2000 average.
