Present-day climate conditions imposed that conditions on early, dry-bake ceramic artists. Because early dry-baked ware was made in the open, it was subject to weathering. The weathering of early dry-baked ware is evident in the early ceramic sherd, the dark fragment found in the archaeological site, from the excavated Neolithic site, near the early ceramic sherd, the dark fragment is not weathered. Abstract.—We tested that the reproductive success of male sand gobies (Pomatoschistus minutus) depends on the number of eggs fertilized by sperm from each female. We found that males do not discriminate between females based on their fecundity. This suggests that the reproductive success of males is determined by the number of eggs they fertilize, rather than by the number of females they mate with.

As you can see, the results were in favor of the new system. The new system was able to handle the data more efficiently and the results were more accurate.
