

As you will come to learn, the sounds of each instrument in VDL are mapped out to specific MIDI pitches; this allows you to use a MIDI keyboard to input the various sounds into your arrangement.

However, most of the time the specific MIDI pitches that correspond to the sounds you want to hear in unpitched VDL instruments are no where near the visual spot on the staff where you would expect to see these notes! Take a look at the keymap diagram for the SnareTime (Auto RL) on page 28 for an idea of how the various sounds that make up that instrument are laid out over the keyboard.

In order for you to be able to hear and input the notes correctly while simultaneously seeing them show up in a logical place in the music notation, you will need to create percussion maps. Percussion maps are created within the notation programs (not VDL) and do the work of translating what the computer hears and where those notes appear on the staff.

Notation Templates

In the VDL community, we refer to “templates” quite a bit. That’s because a lot of VDL users also like to use their sounds within notation programs like Sibelius or Finale. For all intents and purposes, this means a file that has been created in either Sibelius or Finale that contains not only all the percussion maps for the various unpitched instruments in VDL, but also dictionary definitions and expressions that enhance VDL integration by automating or otherwise making intuitive certain aspects of the library, such as keyswitches, modwheel functionality, etc. Don’t worry if you don’t understand all that just yet. That’s what the rest of this manual is for!

What’s important to realize here is that in order for you to get the kind of tight integration between your new VDL library and the software notation program you use, you’re going to want to create a template with percussion maps...or buy one. At the time of this writing there is one company devoted entirely to this endeavor called The Write Score—www.thewritescore.com. They make templates for both Finale and Sibelius that can be immense time savers, especially for new users.
