KEYWORDS Technology Education, Action Research, Reconnaissance Study, Critical Theory, Challenges

ABSTRACT The aim of this article is to report the findings on the gaps that were identified in the teaching of technology by Grade 8 and 9 teachers at Mankweng Circuit of Limpopo Province. This was done so that appropriate action research-based intervention strategies could be embarked upon to fill these gaps. A reconnaissance or preliminary study as the first cycle stage of action research was instrumental in identifying these gaps. Observation, interviews and a questionnaire were employed in gathering data from the teachers from five sampled secondary schools. The findings revealed issues that have to do with technology teachers' ability and capacity (knowledge on lesson planning, assessment, interpretation of curriculum policy and its implementation, resources) and those beyond teacher's control (teaching experience, level of internal and external support, resources, teacher-learner ratios). Identifying these gaps will help inform technology teacher practice about aspects of incapacity and intervention to be considered.

INTRODUCTION

Since its introduction in the South African school curriculum and thus its implementation, the technology education subject has raised a number of interesting issues, not the least of which is a conceptual understanding of technology (Shaffer 1999). Rauscher (2010) concurs that the advent of technology education, nationally and internationally, has posed challenges different from those experienced in regard to other learning areas. Amongst the multiple challenges that can be mentioned, teacher development and empowerment becomes prominent as it is technology teachers that are placed at the forefront to teach learners this relatively new subject. These are teachers lumped with the rest of other teachers when it comes to teacher training, whose situation was even as early as the rolling out of the outcomes-based Curriculum 2005 in 1998, made complex by the new demands posed by the new curriculum itself. The majority of teachers already teaching technology in schools found this initial change to outcomes-based education (OBE) and the introduction of Curriculum 2005 (C2005) to be very complicated, confusing and demoralising with lots of new terminology and content to be learned (De Jager 2011). To try to make the curriculum understandable, more changes followed in 2002 after the review of C2005 in 2000. The reviewed C2005 was renamed National Curriculum Statement (NCS). This review was followed by yet another review in 2009 and in 2010 the curriculum was implemented as planned. This review produced the Curriculum and Assessment Policy Statement (CAPS). CAPS is about the revised policy implementation strategy to try and address the constraints that C2005 to NCS posed (De Jager 2011). This confirms the challenge that teachers face regarding their understanding of the curriculum; expressed in terms of constraints that they face about its implementation. Specifically, technology is an area that needs skilled teachers due to its nature particularly as a theory-practice based subject. However, it is distressing to disclose that 99% of the teachers teaching technology are not qualified to teach technology (Nkomo 2008; Lovington 2009). The situation seems worse in Limpopo Province, which is among provinces known to be underperforming. The researchers therefore chose one circuit in this province to conduct this study.

How they go about presenting this report is first to frame the study within the critical theoretical perspective and its application in the study. Second, they discuss our becoming aware of the problem and our assumptions about it.
