

Violent Television Promotes the Culture of Violence in America

The United States is the most violent industrial country in the world. More Americans die from violence per capita in the United States than in any country in Western Europe, Japan, or Australia . Most of this violence is committed by males, particularly young males. These young men have been raised viewing violent content on broadcast television. This content reinforces the violent behavior that these young men have observed among their peers and older males in their communities. Violence on television cultivates the culture of violence in American society, and the Federal Communications Commission should reduce the amount of violence on television to counter this culture.

The FCC should reduce the amount of violence on television because the current amount of violence on television is excessive. Studies of violence on American television found that American children are exposed to hundreds of violent scenes on television during prime-time hours, which is the most common period when parents watch television with their children. Children become socialized through their television habits. They learn what is normal and what is abnormal based on what they see on television. When their parents let them watch certain television shows, children believe their parents condone the behaviors on television. The constant viewing of violent scenes on television sends children the message that this amount of violence is normal behavior in American society.

The FCC should reduce the amount of violence on television because studies have found a link between viewing violent content on television and aggression. A study reported by the American Psychological Association measured higher rates of aggression in children after they watched violent scenes on television. The researchers theorized that these children might become more violent as adults because of these increases
