These findings on environmental tobacco use suggest a significant adverse impact tobacco use may have on mental health, especially in terms of increased risk for depression. However, these data were not statistically significant and should be interpreted with caution. The authors have sought to minimize the limitations of this study and will continue to explore the relationship between tobacco use and mental health in future research.

Research on the cognitive development of young children shows a clear age-related trend. The developmental pattern is such that understanding that one's own understanding can be incorrect develops later than the ability to understand simple physical causality. This is the case for children with normal hearing, and also for children with hearing impairment. This suggests a general rule that, along with the maturation of the auditory system, the development of the cognitive system is also progressing.
