stray capacitance resulting in poor lateral resolution when they are used to image nanostructures Thus there is a need for a probe that minimizes stray capacitance to produce highly localized electric fields This probe must also self sense topography for tip sample alignment as the conventional laser based detection methods can disturb photosensitive samples In this thesis we present a new scanning probe that integrates a coaxial tip on a piezoresistive cantilever The coaxial tip is comprised of a heavily doped silicon inner conductor and an aluminum outer shield separated by a silicon dioxide insulator By shielding the inner conductor up to the tip apex this tip configuration minimizes stray capacitance to produce narrow electrostatic potential profiles A piezoresistor is embedded at the root of the cantilever and enables electrical measurement of deflection at the free end Scanning gate microscopy is commonly performed at room temperature room T and low temperature low T We discuss the design of piezoresistive cantilevers for atomic force microscopy AFM under both temperature regimes We introduce a numerical optimizer that we used to identify 12 cantilever designs for use at room T and low T for hard semiconductor samples and soft biological samples We show the results of finite element analysis used to predict the electrostatic potential profiles produced by unshielded and coaxial tips We investigate how the full width at half maximum FWHM of the coaxial tip perturbation varies with lift height and tip geometry We discuss the development of a 7 mask process to fabricate scanning probes with both a coaxial tip and a piezoresistor We compare two methods to create sub micron tip apertures with focused ion beam milling and provide a recipe that can repeatably produce openings with a radius of 30 nm We describe the characterization of the piezoresistive cantilevers at room T on a commercial AFM and at low T on a home built cryogenic scanning system Finally we provide images of the potential profile from the coaxial tip obtained using a quantum point contact at low T In a measurement bandwidth from 1 Hz to 10 kHz our scanning probes achieve a vertical displacement resolution of 2.8 Å at 293 K and 82 Å at 2 K where the low temperature performance is limited by amplifier noise When the coaxial tip is 100 nm above a sample the FWHM of the electrostatic potential profile it produces at the surface is less than 240 nm representing a 2.3x improvement in the lateral resolution of SGM over unshielded tips
