

SIGN LANGUAGE

A sign language (also signed language or simply signing) is a language which uses manual communication and body language to convey meaning, as opposed to acoustically conveyed sound patterns. This can involve simultaneously combining hand shapes, orientation and movement of the hands, arms or body, and facial expressions to fully express a speaker's thoughts. They share many similarities with spoken languages (sometimes called "oral languages"), which depend primarily on sound, which is why linguists consider both to be natural languages, but there are also some significant differences between signed and spoken languages.

Whenever communities of deaf people exist, sign languages have been developed. Signing is not only used by the deaf, it is also used by people who can hear, but cannot physically speak. While there are space for grammar in a way that spoken languages do not, sign languages share the same linguistic properties and use the same language faculty as the spoken languages. Hundreds of sign languages are in use around the world and are at the core of local deaf cultures. Some sign languages have obtained some form of legal recognition, while others have no status at all.

A common misconception is that all sign languages are the same worldwide or that sign language is international. Aside from the global International Sign, each country generally has its own, native sign language, and some have more than one, though sign languages may share similarities to each other, whether in the same country or another one.

It is not clear how many sign languages there are, the International web site (a web which supports over 100 written languages, more than any other web site worldwide, has video material in about 40 sign languages. The 2013 edition of Ethnologue lists 137 sign languages.

LINGUISTICS

In linguistic terms, sign languages are as rich and complex as any spoken language, despite the common misconception that they are not "real languages". Professional linguists have studied many sign languages and found that they exhibit the fundamental properties that exist in all languages.

Sign languages are not noise - in other words, signs are conventional, often arbitrary and do not necessarily have a visual relationship to their referent, much as most spoken language is not onomatopoeic. While there is more systematic and widespread in sign languages than in spoken ones, the difference is not categorical. The visual modality allows the human preference for close associations between form and meaning, present but suppressed in spoken languages, to be more fully expressed. This does not mean that sign languages are a visual residue of a spoken language. They have complex grammars of their own, and can be used to discuss any topic, from the simple and concrete to the fully abstract.

Sign languages, like spoken languages, organize elementary, meaningless units (phonemes, once called cheremes in the case of sign languages) into meaningful sentences, units (like in spoken languages, these meaningless units are represented as combinations of) features, although often also single distinctions are made in terms of Handshape (or Handform), Orientation, Location (or Place-of-Articulation), Movement, and Non-manual expressions.

More generally, both sign and spoken languages share the following common features that linguists have found in all natural human languages (criticism needed): 1) Mode-of-communication 2) Semantics 3) Pragmatic function 4) Interchangeability 5) Cultural transmission 6) Arbitrariness 7) Discreteness 8) Displacement 9) Productivity These nine features serve to define the notion "language".

Common linguistic features of many sign languages are the movement of classifiers, a high degree of reduplication, and a topic-comment syntax. More than spoken languages, sign languages can convey meaning by conventional means, e.g. by the use of space, two-manual articulations, and the signer's face and body. Though there is still much discussion on the topic of analogy in
