Suppose the concrete (including reinforcing steel) weighs 25 kN/m^3 , the slab is 200 mm (0.2 m) thick, and the columns are spaced 4 m apart in both directions. We want to know how much dead load each column must support.

First, we work out the area load, i.e. the dead weight G of one square metre of concrete slab. Each square m contains 0.2 m^3 of concrete, so it will weigh $0.2 \times 25 = 5 \text{ kN/m}^2$ or $G = 5 \text{ kPa}$.

Next, we multiply the area load by the tributary area, i.e. the area of slab supported by one column. We assume that each piece of slab is supported by the column closest to it. So we can draw imaginary lines half way between each row of columns in each direction. Each internal column (i.e. those that are not at the edge of the slab) supports a tributary area of 16 m^2 , so the total dead load of the slab on each column is $16 \times 5 = 80 \text{ kN}$.

Assuming there is no overhang at the edges, edge columns will support a little over half as much tributary area because the slab will presumably come to the outer edge of the columns, so the actual tributary area will be $2.1 \times 4 = 8.4 \text{ m}^2$ and the load will be 42 kN . Corner columns will support $2.1 \times 2.1 = 4.42 \text{ m}^2$ and a load of 22.1 kN .

To find the load acting on a cross-section at the bottom of each column where G is maximum, we must also consider the self-weight of the column. Suppose columns are $150\text{UC}30$ sections (i.e. steel universal columns with a mass of 30 kg/m , 4 m high between the floor and the suspended slab. The weight of one column will therefore be $30 \times 9.8 / 1000 \times 4 = 1.2 \text{ kN}$ approximately. Thus the total load on a cross section of an internal column at the bottom will be $80 + 1.2 = 81.2 \text{ kN}$.

If there are two or more levels, as in a multi-level car park or an office building, the load on each ground floor column would have to be multiplied by the number of floors. Thus if our car park has 3 levels, a bottom level internal column would carry a total dead load $G = 3 \times 81.2 = 243.6 \text{ kN}$.
