

The Scenarios of Isolationism

How can isolationism predict the major challenges?

Model 1

The consequences of isolationism for genetic groups occurred in several rather neutral and positive situations. In the combination of alleles that made up the genetic constitution, offspring are self-sufficient; the level of resource control and regulation about resources offspring will have. This system more like a series of Ponzi squares, which is not too far from the production of a single allele combination. However, this does not mean that isolationism predicts about the presence of offspring.

Model 1 – Ponzi Squares

1. Consider the basic question of Model 1:

- How many phenotypes for each trait are observed in the population?

There are two phenotypes for each trait: color (black and white).

- How many genotypes for each trait are observed in the population?

There are three genotypes for each trait: FF and Ff result in a black individual, ff result in a white individual.

2. According to Model 1, which allele, F or f , is the dominant-recessive allele that controls pigmentation with specific evidence from Model 1?

The F allele is dominant. Because the FF genotype results in a black phenotype, the addition of a single f allele is usually enough to not dominate the F gene mutation.
