| Purpose    | Explore natural selection using a laboratory simulation.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Time       | Approximately 45 minutes.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |
| Question   | What is the effect of the type of food available on the frequency of different types of bird beaks?                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| Hypothesis | If the type of the food available changes, then the frequency of beak types will change, because birds with beaks more suited to the available food will be more successful over time.                                                                                                                                                         |
| Variables  | Independent Variable: type of food availableDependent Variable: frequency of each type (size and shape) of beak                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| Summary    | You will simulate three flocks of birds with three different beaks. The birds will compete for three types of food. As they feed, the flocks will change in size over generations. You will repeat this process (with identical flocks) with only two types of food. This will allow you to compare results after the third generation. |

Lab Procedure

NOTE: If you are doing this lab virtually, you will omit the steps in orange text, which explain how to simulate the bird beaks and food in a classroom setting.

Step 1: Simulate Birds with Three Beak Phenotypes

Each flock of birds will have a different beak phenotype. Flock X will have pointed, piercing beaks that are good at piercing. Flock Y will have strong, spoon like beaks. Flock Z will have thin pinching beaks.

When doing this in the classroom, the class should divide into three equally sized "flocks." Each student should obtain a plastic cup to represent the bird's stomach and one of the "beaks":

Flock X: pointed, piercing beaks (pairs of forks)

Flock Y: strong, spoon like beaks (pair of spoons)

Flock Z: thin pinching beaks (pair of knives)

Step 2: Simulate an Environment with Equal Amounts of Insects, Seeds, and Fruit

You will simulate a field with 300 pieces of food—100 seeds, 100 pieces of fruit, and 100 insects. Which flock will be able to eat the most? The least? Why? Record a prediction on the data sheet.

In the classroom, lay out the food below at random on a large table cloth.

100 seeds (sunflower seeds)

100 pieces of fruit (raisins)

100 insects (grains of rice)

Natural Selection in the Wild John A. Endler,2020-03-31 Natural selection is an immense and important subject yet there have been few attempts to summarize its effects on natural populations and fewer still which discuss the problems of working with natural selection in the wild These are the purposes of John Endler s book In it he discusses the methods and problems involved in the demonstration and measurement of natural selection presents the critical evidence for its existence and places it in an evolutionary perspective Professor Endler finds that there are a remarkable number of direct demonstrations of selection in a wide variety of animals and plants The distribution of observed magnitudes of selection in natural populations is surprisingly broad and it overlaps extensively the range of values found in artificial selection He argues that the common assumption that selection is usually weak in natural populations is no longer tenable but that natural selection is only one component of the process of evolution natural selection can explain the change of frequencies of variants but not their origins
