Work Your Mind

ring accreeiving out on your own may be the bout very to know By Annie Magdy Flori and Stephanie Kinns Charles Steel Steel

Adapted from Name Street, 65th, 55th

Here's asymptoting to think about the next time you sait your teacher for helps struggling with esheelwork on your even pan hele you learn. According to a recent study, the more you struggle while you are learning new information, the better you pen remember it later.

This theory might supprise you. When temphers are presenting new information, they generally give students late of help. But a new study shows this may not be the best way to support learning. Bon't be too pulck to get help when learning something rest," education essent Manu Kapur told TRIC. "The to vest on it was real even if it means their additional serve."

Difference from III agreements

Kepur came up with the idea that struggling can lead to better learning. Then he tested it out on students in Singapore. He assurated students into two groups, in the first group, students were extend to across much problems with the teacher's help. In the second proces, students were extend to palve the same preliferal by helping one another, instead of petting help from the treature,

With the beacher's help, students in the first group were side to find the sorrest answers. Students in the second prove did not selve the problems correctly. But they slid come up with a lot of poposi identi.

The students were then tested on what they had learned. The group without any help from a teacher appred much higher than the group who had help. Keput said working to find the answers. helped students understand the economic not just the epiction.

Kepur's solvine for kids is to put a lot of effort into learning something new rether than going to your teacher for help. "Simply doing a little work or nothing at all won't work," says Kepur, "The struggle meeds to be a genuine etternat to figure out or solve a problem in as many ways as possible."
