History showed impressive gains in literacy for students in the Mississippi Delta in the 1960s. The Mississippi Department of Education had a special superintendent traveling on the circuit to monitor quality. Unfortunately, however, the momentum stopped after a series of crises at the state level: political paralysis, teacher's unions, budget cuts, and a general loss of faith. The state's literacy program was dismantled and the state is now a very underperforming participant in the national third-grade assessment. Improving literacy is a high priority for the state and the federal government. Improving literacy is a high priority for the state and the federal government.
