fact the art of recording by a few strokes of the pencil or touches of the pen the remembrance of a thing we have seen or the impression of a scene we have imagined A sketch bears the same relation to a finished drawing as shorthand notes bear to a revised report I here speak of course of the note sketch rapidly set down for the word sketch is also applied to studies from Nature often a good deal elaborated I will try to divide into classes the various modes of sketching and more especially to indicate some practical methods of executing and of making use of a sketch for individual artistic temperament and character have greater influence than might be supposed both on the treatment and the result Some persons aim chiefly at rapid draughtsmanship others give more time to the matter Some attend chiefly to detail others only look at the mass and such sketches though drawn and rendered in different ways may be equally good each in its own line In the same way and this too is a matter of natural temperament a subject a motive which charms one man will leave another absolutely unmoved In any case whether the draughtsman be quick or slow emotional or apathetic there is nothing so interesting or so refreshing as sketching from Nature The more you sketch the more you will long to sketch so much so that if once you make a beginning it will become a necessity almost a mania as innocent a mania as fly fishing and certainly quite as absorbing and far less unpleasant so far as the gudgeon and the bleak are concerned
