

Summer Study Guide Week 3

For everyone who wanted specific How-Tos, the Rando book is chock full! This week's chapter assignments, particularly, offer what to ask and how to ask it, and then based on the answer, what to ask next. And your Traumatic Bereavement text is equally thorough in assessing the client for appropriateness and readiness for their proposed intervention strategy. So, here we go: Assessment, assessment, assessment.

Rando Chapter 6 Clinical Assessment of Grief and Mourning

Part I: Introduction (Why this is important and why it may be tricky):

Assessment Issues

- Three unique assessment issues are
 - Importance of a continual assessment
 - P 244 "Without an appreciation of all the factors involved few judgments can be made about the health of pathology of a response and little confidence can be placed in the efficacy of interventions.
 - Grief and mourning do not necessarily decline in a linear fashion over time. ...there are many twists and turns
 - Assumptions based on initial assessment without continual monitoring can be quite incorrect for the mourner down the line.
 - Influence of the mourner's state of mind on Assessment
 - Conducting an assessment of a mourner can be different from evaluating an individual under other circumstances. These are examples of reasons why this is true:
 - P 245 "...the mourner experiences additional agony because she has no choice regarding the death---it has already taken place
 - This lack of choice regarding the death can make the mourner feel hopeless as well as bitter and these emotions can interfere with necessary data gathering."
 - Another important difference... is that the state of loss initiating or perpetuating the difficulty is permanent. ... (last sentence in this par.) ...there may be a strong "what's the use?" attitude.
 - The loss may so violate the mourner's assumptive world that there is little ongoing structure, order, stability or meaning to sustain her. This may cause the mourner to experience even more threat or danger. P 245
 - (bottom of p 245) The breadth and intensity of acute grief and the long-term impact under these circumstances may deplete the mourner of the necessary energy and strength to cope as well as exacerbate stress, fear of loss of control, and anxiety about the meanings and consequences of often unexpected reactions. All of this can cause the mourner presenting for treatment to be more distressed and less willing to cooperate than the client presenting with a different problem.
