What knowledge would have benefited you when starting your manga career?

Knowing what storyboards actually are. I would start telling my stories using full-on underdrawings instead.

(This was the era before the internet existed.)

What did you do first after deciding to become a manga author (e.g., practicing, strategizing, etc.)? And/or, did you have an efficient way to practice?

Drawing things realistically. Drawing Disney cartoons frame by frame. Drawing fashion show models at the same speed they popped out onto the catwalk.

What are you mindful of when revising your own storyboards (either when self-editing or taking advice from editorial)?

Coming to grips with my editor saying, "Right, that turned out how I thought." I start thinking about what led them to expect what was coming. A lot of the time, there's no clear reason.

Is there any way you could have been better prepared before your serialization began?

All the thinking in the world can't fully prepare you, so I say just go for it.

and once you've made it, then start practicing. You'll figure it out. Human beings are amazing that way.

What do you bear in mind when creating manga (e.g., personal themes and throughlines)?

I want to show readers something new.

Continued...

What's your approach to creating strong, memorable characters?

Distinct visual traits.

How should one practice creating these strong characters?

Observe people in real life.

How many works/pages did you create leading up to your first real submission? How many works/pages from that first submission until your magazine debut?

I drew manga in notebooks in sixth grade. One of my manga was a finalist in a contest in my first year of high school. In my final year of high school, they published my Tezuka Award-winning work "Wanted." I couldn't give you concrete numbers, but I've drawn every day since the moment I could.

What's your approach to creating manga that's readable?

Good phraseology.

How long does it take to create the storyboards for a single nineteen-page chapter of manga?

I like to finish within three days, if it takes longer, I just have to finish the draft quicker.

How long does it take you to finish the full draft for a single nineteen-page chapter of manga?

Three days, ideally. I'd take all the time in the world, if I could.

Beyond creating your storyboards, what do you do to come up with ideas and plot points for your work?

I take copious notes on movies and anything else remotely inspiring in everyday life. It's too easy to forget stuff otherwise.

Is there anything you referenced when creating your one-shots?

Nothing at all. How naive I was. The internet now makes it so easy to look stuff up, and everything you need to know about art is basically sitting there, so I say make use of those resources.
