

In the near future, we will see lots of television programs broadcast the digital way using ground waves, satellite waves and cables, to name a few. Different broadcasting styles are supposed to provide for different services. Here are some of the advantages that digital broadcasting is expected to offer.

- Upgraded picture and sound quality: Studio-quality audio-video grades in your home.
- More and more programs: Much more TV channels offered with progresses in compression/modulation technology.
- New types of services: Ready to give multimedia services and interactive programs.
- Brand-new reception system: Intelligent automatic reception and recording of TV programs.

In the analog broadcasting currently used, different modulation systems are used for picture, sound and data. The digital broadcasting can run with just one modulation system. This means that a digital broadcast wave can be used more flexibly in more ways than the analog method and that new types of services can be introduced easily.

Compared with analog modulation, the digital one can be performed with weaker radio waves; that is, at lower C/N ratio. The cross protection ratio, which is essential for good reception without interference, can be kept lower. This helps utilize wider frequency bands.

1. DIGITAL BROADCASTING TECHNOLOGY

Figure 1-1. shows a block diagram of digital broadcasting system. The sending side consists of the following blocks: source coding block to compress video, audio, data and other information; multiplexing block to multiplex those sets of compressed information; error correction coding block to correct errors of the information being transmitted; and digital demodulation block. Those processes are carried out in the reverse order at the receiving side.

Compression and multiplex technologies, among others, are desired to be used commonly in various types of digital broadcasting. An international standardization is also required. In this way, TV receiver production costs could be cut down. What's more, just one TV receiver would be enough at home to receive all digital broadcast programs and other information services. The modulation and error correction technologies would also be best suited for a radio wave frequency as well as a transmission medium: ground, satellite or cable.
