These findings have important implications for the management and development of the New South Wales and other jurisdictions. While government has a variety of other responsibilities and legal obligations towards its citizens, the responsibility for the management of the environment rests with the community. Through education, the community can be empowered to take such actions. Through environmental education, responsibility can be shifted from government to the community, and government can then focus on providing the infrastructure, resources, information and support. In addition, the focus on education also ensures that people themselves rather than the government are the "owners" of the environment. "Government is just a word" (Hargrave, 1997). (Hargrave has been the president of the Society for Environmental Education, a group of over 1000 people, throughout Australia, and has spent considerable time in the environment, water sector and New South Wales government. He has been successful in his endeavours to get the community involved in the environment.)
