

While considerable research tells us that psychotherapists learn from their clients, we know little about what therapists learn from their clients. We interviewed over 60 psychotherapists to see what they have learned from their clients, both personally and professionally. Psychologists discuss learning life lessons about relationships, ethical decision making, coping, courage, wisdom, psychopathology, personality, cultural differences and lifespan development, all thanks to their work and personal lives. The self-reflective, richly elaborated therapist narratives may be inspiring to professionals and anyone interested in psychotherapy. The psychologists interviewed reported learning much from clients with whom they work, and expressed respect for their wisdom and courage.
