Octopus Adaptations

When you think of "monster of the deep" when thinking about ocean animals, what comes to mind? Sharks? This name is given to octopus. They have many adaptations that allow them to survive in the deep waters of the ocean. Adaptations are characteristics, physical or behavioral, that allow an animal to survive in its habitat.

One of these adaptations is that octopus have a body that is not seen on their head. In the middle of where all their arms meet to be confused with tentacles connect. This body can crack the shells of crabs, mussels and lobsters. This helps them eat the meat of these animals.

Another adaptation of the Octopus is that they have 8 arms. Many people call them tentacles, but the difference is that the arm and tentacles just have them at the ends. These 8 arms can work independently. They can move each arm separately. They can crawl, swim, and touch something different at the same time.

Octopus also do not have any bones. This can be a very helpful adaptation when it comes to hiding or getting somewhere new. They can squeeze their bodies to fit through any opening that is as small as their head. This is because the head is the only part of the body that cannot change its form or size as it is the hard body part of an octopus. So, if the head can fit through an opening, the octopus can get its whole body into the opening as well.

A commonly known adaptation is the ink of an octopus. It is used to distract or confuse their enemies when they are getting away or moving quickly. The octopus sprays water to move and then, when they spray water, it is as if they are shooting water one way and then moving backwards in the opposite direction.

While these are amazing adaptations to allow for survival, they are not the octopus's only adaptations. They also have 3 hearts, 9 brains and they have copper in their blood that helps them move oxygen easily throughout their body.

An octopus camouflages its color and the texture of its skin, allowing them to blend in with their surroundings.
