

The Jungle Upton Sinclair's book The Jungle is a thinly veiled support piece for the concept of socialism, but he pulls it off well by placing the situation at the level of the poor working class of his time. Jurgis Rudkus and his family are all brought together at the beginning of the story under a roof of love and togetherness. Sinclair does this to make it clear that this is a family just like every family in America and has just as much right to 'the pursuit of happiness' as everyone who lives in this country. Ona's death and the death of their child causes Jurgis to lead a life of begging and crime, illustrating how it is the system's willing abuse of the 'common man' that creates the problems of the criminal lower class while the upper class becomes just as criminal in working to abuse the system for their own welfare. The concept of socialism is first introduced as Ona and Jurgis are planning their wedding feast and grows to become one of the central themes of the book.

It is Grandmother Majauskiene who first mentions the word "Socialist" to Jurgis. She describes the capitalist system: "It was easy to bring them, for wages were really much higher, and it was only when it was too late that the poor people found out that everything else was higher too. They were like rats in a trap, that was the truth" (95). It would seem clear that whatever she defines herself as would be the opposite of the system in place. Just before she introduces the word socialism, though, a suggestion of what it might mean is offered, "By and by they would have their revenge, though, for the thing was getting beyond human endurance, and the people would rise and murder the packers" (95). This seems to suggest something violent and destructive, which frightens the simple man.
