

Advertising Essay: Choosing Simple, Making It Complex

How many topics have you covered in your advertising essays? – Probably, a lot or just a few. Most students choose the ‘big’ issues. Of course, big is catchy and interesting. Any reader will read an advertising essay that handles things that matter, anything that is ‘big deal.’

Funny, students don’t seem to realise that while they courageously take on the ‘biggie’ of advertising field, they have no real inputs worth putting. This doesn’t portend to demean or reduce students’ potential to come up with the most profound observations. In truth, this implicates the fact that students simply don’t have yet the tools and experience to hang on ‘big’ issues.

Instead, of this ‘biggies,’ why not take something that is ‘small’ and write it ‘big.’ In other terms, try to place for your advertising essay a simple, regular advertising component that is yes, small in ‘deal,’ but is nevertheless significant in the field or of inherent value. Say, for instance, the creative briefs.
