 12. The confidence interval is a range of values that is likely to contain the true population parameter. It is calculated based on the sample mean, standard deviation, and a chosen level of confidence.
 13. The hypothesis test is a statistical test used to determine whether there is a significant difference between a sample mean and a population mean. It involves comparing the sample mean to a critical value and making a decision based on the results.
 14. The p-value is the probability of obtaining a test statistic as extreme as the one observed, assuming that the null hypothesis is true. It is used to determine the significance of the results of a hypothesis test.
 15. The effect size is a measure of the magnitude of the difference between a sample mean and a population mean. It is used to determine the practical significance of the results of a hypothesis test.
