investigations. The authors also looked at a 1999 incident in which a 10-year-old boy was killed by a stray bullet. An investigation was not done. It would not have been until 2001 that the state's law was changed to require that the responsible agency be a law-enforcement agency (not a school, for example). The authors also found that, for example, children are not always at the front of the investigation as a result of their parents' reluctance.

Stipulation: the author does not require the reader to believe that the stipulated propositions are true. For example, the stipulation that the author is a philosopher does not require the reader to believe that the author is a philosopher.
