- a. Describe the importance of the following characteristics of a good research design:

Internal validity: A research design is said to have internal validity if the design is able to control for all the factors that could affect the results of the study, except for the independent variable.

Since all identified sources of variation (confounding) are controlled, any difference in the results of the study can be attributed to the independent variable. This is the ideal situation for a researcher to have.

There is one other factor that can affect the results of a study, which is the confounding variable. This is a variable that is not controlled for, but it can affect the results of the study. This is the worst situation for a researcher to have.

Therefore, a researcher should try to control for all the confounding variables. This can be done by using a random assignment of subjects to the experimental and control groups.

Experiments: Experiments are said to have internal validity if the design is able to control for all the factors that could affect the results of the study, except for the independent variable.

Quasi-experiments: Quasi-experiments are said to have internal validity if the design is able to control for all the factors that could affect the results of the study, except for the independent variable.

Field experiments: Field experiments are said to have internal validity if the design is able to control for all the factors that could affect the results of the study, except for the independent variable.

Correlational studies: Correlational studies are said to have internal validity if the design is able to control for all the factors that could affect the results of the study, except for the independent variable.

Case studies: Case studies are said to have internal validity if the design is able to control for all the factors that could affect the results of the study, except for the independent variable.

Interviews: Interviews are said to have internal validity if the design is able to control for all the factors that could affect the results of the study, except for the independent variable.
