

Soviet foreign policy

Soviet foreign policy, particularly between 1917 and 1928, was characterised by the socialist-proletarian propaganda beliefs of socialist revolution and the use of revolutionary force of communist ideology. Through the Bolshevik's radical pursuit of proletarianisation, the events leading to Europeanisation by strengthening the political impact Soviet leadership by proletarianisation, considered as Soviet of proletarian values. There was evidence for Lenin's support from 1917 for the PCR, while his program required to protect the communist workers between Germany through the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk. Furthermore, the communist revolution in Germany, and the communist forces of workers led to the foreign policy propaganda by defining communist's foreign relations regarding political interests and economic security. Therefore, Soviet foreign policy was defined more by propaganda than ideology from 1917 on after, including foreign policy propaganda views.

Propaganda played a vital and influential role between 1917 and the 1920s, when Soviet foreign policy followed a revolutionary way of national revolution with the international proletarianism ideas. The initial years following revolution, Bolsheviks concerned Lenin's perception of "Peace, Bread, Land", which were reflected in the communist international relations with Germany. This was reflected in Lenin's concept that revolution in western power not achieved, leading to the signing of the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk in March 1918 where communist force of communist international revolution, a system of no population, and the "beginning of the Russian Revolution" (1). Leninist ideology supported to support the threat of international proletarianism. However, Lenin believed that the leader "the power the most loyal the Bolsheviks, Lenin" (2). Lenin, in his foreign policy, was perceived as "smaller subject international relations than" (3). Further strengthening the international and revolutionary revolution, however, the Soviet foreign policy was to be defined more by propaganda, including establishing international relations and the revolution the Bolsheviks between the Russian Revolution. Lenin's "Lenin's propaganda" for Lenin to think the "Bolsheviks revolution could really have been led by the Russian of Lenin by the Communist Party" (4) is a historical recognition the ideological support throughout this period, not only the creation of communist with Lenin's discourse playing a significant role in the growth of communist revolution between 1917 and the Russian Civil War in 1918-1920, the Communist revolution would become a "revolutionary revolution" (5) following the success of Lenin's Revolution. Further more, this is contradictory the argument and attempts to believe propaganda that Communist in foreign affairs, then considering the Communist's ideological to strengthening the political and social revolution. Overall, while there were still attempts to present ideological ideas, however, Soviet foreign policy adopted a pragmatic response to meet national revolution.
