T. S. Eliot was in the worst circumstances and the aftermath, that followed the ghastly bombing, but he said they all absorbed the grief in their own ways, and he himself said after the war he might not have returned to London. "I still cannot actually speaking freely about things that were right there," T. S. Eliot wrote to friends from the postwar, with a not particularly cheerful reference to the fact that the war's terrible aftermath would not be completely forgotten even a century later. "I accepted this terrible reality at the time," he explained after the war. "The great strength of the postwar was the strength of the people who were left behind. There was the only unbroken line of the British people, who, with their great strength and their determination, tried to make the things that were left behind, and they made them." Eliot's response to the war was a poem, "The Waste Land," which was about the war and the war's aftermath. He wrote the poem in 1920, and it was the first of a series of poems that he wrote in the years after the war. "The Waste Land" was the first of a series of poems that he wrote in the years after the war. "The Waste Land" was the first of a series of poems that he wrote in the years after the war.
