Because being politically informed requires time and energy, most Americans seek to acquire political political decisions "on the cheap" making use of shortcuts and decision making rather than engaging in deliberation hering. Researchers have found that individuals use party elites and the media to aid them in making these shortcuts have found stark evidence that polarized political environments substantially change how citizens make decisions and form opinions. Notably, polarization between the parties means that party endorsements (such as of an may or maynot have a larger impact on public opinion formation than they used to. At the same time, polarization decreases the impact of other information on public opinion—that is, party polarization may actually reduce levels of political knowledge. Thus, elite polarization may have negative implications for public opinion formation.³¹ Skills and News Another factor affecting political knowledge is the form in which people consume information. The transformation of political information in the digital era has had a profound effect on the way the news is reported and how citizens learn about politics. A 2012 survey found that 36 percent of social networking site users say these sites are important for their political information and that more than three in four Americans read the news online or seek political information online.³² Recent research also indicates a trend in journalism toward shorter articles and flashier headlines. Americans today are likely to read the news by scanning and skimming multiple headlines online, in lists and bytes, rather than by reading long news articles.³³

To illustrate how political knowledge matters, consider tax policy. As discussed in the introduction to this chapter, the United States has one of the largest gaps between the rich and the poor of any nation in the world. But rather than raise taxes, over the past several decades the United States has substantially reduced the rate of taxation levied on its wealthiest citizens. Most recently, tax cuts signed into law by George W. Bush in 2001 and extended by President Obama provided a substantial tax break mainly for the top 1 percent of the nation's wage earners.
Political scientist Larry Bartels has shown that, surprisingly, most Americans favor the tax cuts, including millions of middle- and lower-middle-class citizens who do not stand to benefit from the tax policy. Additionally, 40 percent of Americans have no opinion at all regarding the Bush tax cuts.³⁴ The explanation for this odd state affair appears to be a lack of political knowledge. Millions of individuals who w
