

Chapter 1

	Longitudinal Approaches	Cross-Sectional Approaches
Observational Studies	+ Document individuals' developmental transitions. – Participants may drop out as study progresses.	+ Easier to ensure that the same number of participants take part at all ages. – Do not track individuals' developmental trajectories.
Experimental Studies	+ May uncover long-term patterns of change in individuals. – Require a long time commitment from research staff.	+ Reveal distinctive patterns for each age group. – Questions about individual differences are more difficult to address.
Experimental Studies	+ Allow exploration of cause-and-effect relationships. + Researchers can design focused assessments of specific variables. – Create possibilities of ecologically invalid measures.	+ Enable quick assessment of hypothesized differences between age groups. – May miss key transitions, as well as individual developmental patterns.

STUDY AND REVIEW

SUMMARY

Why Study Development?

- Developmental psychology is a complex, elegant, and intrinsically fascinating scientific study of how children's minds and behaviors grow over time.
- Studying development offers insights into psychological structures and processes in adults by describing how those processes originate and take shape.
- An understanding of psychological development is critically relevant to many decisions about social policy, ranging from changes to local elementary schools to questions concerning children's legal rights.

The Nature of Development

- In considering the nature of developmental change, we want to know whether a developmental change is stage-like or continuous and whether change occurs globally or in a more local manner.
- Nature and nurture always work together to shape development. In looking more closely at interactions between nature and nurture, we can consider which kinds of development are more heavily influenced by nature and which are more influenced by nurture.

Perspectives on Development

- The various perspectives employed by researchers in developmental psychology function much like different lenses on development: each one brings certain issues and questions into sharp focus and de-emphasizes or even ignores others.

- Empiricism and nativist perspectives propose different models of how the mind processes information once that information has passed through our sensory and perceptual systems. Empiricism views emphasis the idea that a general system for learning associations based on experience is present at birth. Nativist views emphasize the idea that various learning systems are present at birth and that each system acquires particular kinds of information more readily than others.
- Evolutionary and comparative perspectives start with the premise that many organisms other than humans confront similar challenges in development. These perspectives use cross-species comparisons, as well as long-term historical considerations, to ask about how and why humans develop as they do.
- Cross-cultural perspectives compare patterns of developmental change across several different cultures; they ask which aspects of development remain relatively consistent across cultures and which ones vary dramatically.
- Neuroscience perspectives ask how brain development guides or constrains psychological development.
- Behaviorist perspectives focus on observable behaviors and ask how they are shaped by reinforcement over the course of development.
- Psychoanalytic perspectives are concerned with internal states and processes and their influences on behavior. They also focus on early experiences and unresolved conflicts and their effects later in life.
- Cognitive science perspectives consider how developmental changes in the mind relate to ways of acquiring, representing, and using information. These perspectives draw on
