Observed difference ✓

Chi test

Observed difference ✓

Data:

- A numeric variable (like weight)
- A categorical variable (like sex)

Observation from the data:

- The average weight for males is more than that for females

Research question:

- Is this difference due to chance difference?

Start with a null hypothesis:

- The average weight is equal

Perform a Student's T test:

- If the p-value is less than 0.05, we can conclude that the difference between categories is statistically significant.

Observation from the data:

- As we look at the observations in the different height categories, we see different proportions of men and women. We would also see the association if we looked at the sex groups separately: the proportion of people who were short, medium and tall would be different in the two or is it statistically significant?

Sex and Height Categories

Can you reject the null hypothesis or between sex and height categories is

Null hypothesis ✗

Data:

- A numeric variable (like weight)
- A categorical variable (like American, British, etc.)

Observation from the data:

- The average weight for Americans is more than that for British

Research question:

- Is this difference due to chance difference?

Start with a null hypothesis:

- The average weight in each group is the same

Perform an ANOVA:

- If the p-value is less than 0.05 then you can reject the null hypothesis and conclude that the difference between means (averages) in the three categories is statistically significant. Note that this test doesn't tell you which of the three is different. It just tells you that they are not all the same.

Null hypothesis ✗

Correlation test

Is there an association between the two variables or is it statistically significant?

Start with a null hypothesis:

- There is no association between the two variables

Perform a Correlation test:

- If the p-value is less than 0.05, we can conclude that the correlation is statistically significant. This test coefficient (that tells you about the strength of the relationship)
