Multiple Choice Questions for Chapter 18:

The Stars: A Celestial Census

by Andrew Fraknoi

Section 18.1: A Stellar Census

1. Most of the stars we can see with the unaided eye from Earth are
 - a. intrinsically fainter than the Sun
 - b. very close to us (among the closest stars)
 - c. more luminous (intrinsically brighter) than the Sun
 - d. only visible to our eyes because they actually consist of three or more stars blending their light together
 - e. undergoing some sort of explosion which makes their outer layers unusually bright
2. Most of the really bright stars in our sky are NOT among the stars that are very close to us. Why then do they look so bright to us?
 - a. we see them in crowded regions of stars, which give us the impression that the stars there are brighter than they really are
 - b. all the brightest stars are red, and red color is much easier to see against the black night sky
 - c. these stars vary in brightness (flashing brighter and dimmer) and are thus easier to notice
 - d. these stars are intrinsically so luminous, that they can easily be seen even across great distances
 - e. actually, this is just an optical illusion; all stars are really the same brightness
3. Some "superstars" give off more than 50,000 times the energy of the Sun. Why are there no such stars among the stars that are close to the Sun?
 - a. because conditions in the "neighborhood" of the Sun only permit low-mass (low luminosity) stars to form
 - b. because such very luminous stars are extremely rare, and thus any small neighborhood in the Galaxy is unlikely to contain one of them
 - c. because all stars in the vicinity of the Sun have planets, and planets rob a star of its brightness
 - d. because such superstars only give off a lot of energy for a year or so, before they die
 - e. because such superstars are really several hundred stars blending their light together (but so far away we can't distinguish individual stars); nearby stars are easy to separate
4. The most common kinds of stars in the Galaxy have
 - a. low luminosity compared to the Sun
 - b. spectra that show they contain mostly carbon
