Abstract

On top of other developments, we're adding greater refinement that will also tend to transform the look and feel of the system. The 32-bit kernel is the first example and other components follow. We think the FTS represents well what we're doing.

Abstract

Although the 1990s showed that "the old, old-fashioned" 100- and 150-watt incandescent bulbs are a real waste of money (averaging 11 to 15 cents each per year), smaller 40- and 60-watt compact fluorescents (CFLs) are a better bet. CFLs use 75 percent less energy than incandescent bulbs and last 10 times longer. They also contain no mercury, and they're safe to use in any room. CFLs are available in many shapes and sizes, and they come in a variety of colors. For more information, visit www.doe.gov.

Abstract

For the purposes of this study, the authors used a convenience sample of 100 students from two universities in Oregon. The first university is a public university and the second is a private university. The students were recruited through email and social media. The sample was divided into two groups of 50 students each. The first group was composed of students who were currently enrolled in a psychology course, and the second group was composed of students who were not currently enrolled in a psychology course. The students were recruited from the first university and the second university. The students were recruited from the first university and the second university. The students were recruited from the first university and the second university.
