

LESSON 2 Actions

Everything that can be thought at all can be thought clearly.

Everything that can be said can be said clearly.

- Ludwig Wittgenstein

Understand How We Make Judgments

We have words enough to praise the writing we like: clear, direct, concise, and more than enough to abuse what we don't: unclear, indirect, dense, abstract, complex. We can use those words to distinguish these two sentences:

1a. The cause of our school's failure at teaching basic skills is not understanding the influence of cultural background on learning.

1b. Our schools have failed to teach basic skills because they do not understand how cultural background influences the way a child learns.

Most of us would call (1a) dense and complex and (1b) clearer, more direct. But those words don't refer to anything IN those sentences; they describe how those sentences make us feel. When we say that 1a is unclear, we mean that WE had a hard time understanding it; we say it's dense when we have to struggle through it. The problem is to understand what is in those two sentences that makes readers feel as they do. Only then can you rise above your too-good understanding of your own writing to know when readers will think it needs revising. To do that, you have to know what counts as a well-told story.

Telling Stories about Characters and Their Actions

It is easy to state the most general principle for clear sentences: Make the main character in your sentence its subject and make its important actions verbs. This story doesn't do that:

2a. Once upon a time, as a walk through the woods was taking place on the part of Little Red Riding Hood, the Wolf's jump out from behind a tree occurred, causing her fright.

We prefer a sentence closer to this:
