The catalog uses two character designations: letters and numbers. Letters in a reference number and numbers indicate the quantity of a component or machine.

Machine Assembly Reference Numbers:

Each machine assembly has reference numbers in the form A-B. The A character is the reference number of the entire machine assembly and the B character is a component number unique to each year model of a machine assembly.

For example, a snowblower might be identified by reference number A-123456. The letter A is the machine type, 123456 is the model number. When you place the assembly identified by reference number A, you should be able to identify the individual components of it. For example, you may identify any part uniquely by reference number of the type shown in the following table.

For example, in a reference number B-123456, the letter B is the machine type, 123456 is the model number. The letter B is the quantity of the component identified by the reference number.

For example, in a reference number B-123456, the letter B is the quantity of the component identified by the reference number. The letter B is the quantity of the component identified by the reference number.
