conducted from 1994 through 2004 by anthropologists Thomas L. Lewis, Richard L. Shweder, and Michael N. Gelfand, titled "Culture and the Development of Gender Attributions in Early Childhood"

Researchers predicted that the cultural gender ideology that the participants held for their own culture would be related to the gender attributions that they made for their children. Specifically, researchers predicted that mothers who held a more traditional gender ideology would be more likely to attribute masculine traits to their sons and feminine traits to their daughters. In contrast, mothers who held a more egalitarian gender ideology would be more likely to attribute both masculine and feminine traits to their sons and daughters. The researchers also predicted that mothers who held a more traditional gender ideology would be more likely to attribute masculine traits to their sons and feminine traits to their daughters than mothers who held a more egalitarian gender ideology. The researchers also predicted that mothers who held a more traditional gender ideology would be more likely to attribute masculine traits to their sons and feminine traits to their daughters than mothers who held a more egalitarian gender ideology.
