ABSTRACT: The government of Ghana implemented an Economic Recovery Program (ERP) in 1983, aimed at the restoration of fiscal discipline towards increasing revenue and promoting economic growth. In spite of the fiscal reforms' growth in tax, revenue continues to lag behind that of government expenditure and compares poorly with revenue performance in other parts of the world. Economic growth in the country also settled around 5 per cent level for two decades after the introduction of the fiscal reforms. This paper examined the effect of tax policy measures on economic growth and explored the tax revenue threshold that optimizes economic growth using time series data for the period 1970 - 2020. The data sets involve GDP per capita, stock of human capital, physical capital, growth rate of working population, and six (6) tax indicators namely: import duty, excise tax, company tax, personal income tax, income and property tax, and value added tax. The results of the unit root test reveal that all the variables are stationary at levels and first difference. The bounds test signals the existence of long run relationship among the variables at 1 per cent level of significance. Employing the Autoregressive Distributed- Lag technique, the findings suggested that economic growth benefits from increases in import taxes and company taxes more than the other types of taxes both in the short and long run. However, increases in the share of value added taxes and personal income taxes were found to have deleterious effect on economic growth in Ghana. A threshold level of 14.48 per cent of tax revenue - GDP ratio was found to be optimal level of taxes that impact economic growth. The study recommends that broadening, nurturing and sustaining tax base should be the utmost target of policy to ensure significant increase in the total government revenue to promote economic growth.

INTRODUCTION

Achieving economic growth has become one of the main concerns of governments over the world, the reason being that it affects a country's future standard of living (Raynor, 2013). On the other hand, governments especially in developing countries are saddled with a growing responsibility of public goods provision due to increasing population and technological advancement (Ofoegbu et al., 2016). In this vein, economic growth increases the taxable capacity of a country and enables a higher share of the private sector's resources to be surrendered to government as taxes to provide public goods and services. Thus, the tax system becomes a major tool for the mobilization of a country's domestic resource and thereby promoting conducive environment for stimulating economic growth (Ayuba, 2014). The need to research into the relationship between tax policy and economic growth can therefore not be overemphasized.

Two main strands of thoughts exist in the literature on the tax policy-economic growth nexus, namely, the exogenous and endogenous school of thoughts. The former school of thought which focuses on the exogenous growth model was initiated by Solow (1956); argued that tax policy does not promote long term growth, as the key factors of economic expansion-labour and technological advancement are exogenously determined. The latter school of thought on the other hand, pioneered by Lucas (1988), King and Rebelo (1990) and Barro (1990) dwelled on endogenous models, and contended that tax policy has

Tax Policy for Economic Recovery and Sustainable Development After COVID-19 Tetiana Kaneva, Igor Chugunov, Mykola Pasichnyi, Nikitishin Andriy, Nataliia Husarevych, 2022 The optimal taxation level and tax structure depend on numerous factors and enormously differ from country to country However the two mentioned tax policy instruments could ensure economic recovery and sustainable economic growth This article aims to examine the effects of tax policy on economic development and evaluate the role of appropriate tax instruments in speeding up recovery The results showed that tax level harms the GDP per capita growth rate in Central Europe and Baltic states over the 2000-2021 period Another vital finding is the increase in both overall employment and investment to GDP ratio positively affected the real GDP per capita growth rates In order to foster economic growth government might use tax cuts and other stimuli both for distortionary and non distortionary taxes The tax policy's institutional potential should be improved to neutralize the adverse effects of COVID-19 impact and enhance macroeconomic sustainability
