Chapter Title: Is Global Environmental Degradation an issue of Poverty rather than Policy?

I. ISSUE INTRODUCTION

“Environmental degradation is the atrophy in environmental quality from pollutants and other activities and processes such as improper land use and natural disasters”. This statement may seem inconsequential, although the consequences are decimating. The foundational reasons of the degradations are the dynamic inter play among socio-economic, institutional and technological activities. But, poverty remains a root cause of several environmental problems. Poor are forced to use marginal resources. They follow unsustainable practices by expansion of farming into marginal lands, clear tracts of rainforest for its timber value, clear the land through destructive farming and ranching practices into fragile and unproductive ecosystems that leads to soil degradation, erosion and landslides. It is argued that environmental conservation is a luxury that the poor cannot afford because their livelihood is at stake, and thus this remains an unsolved vicious circle (Duraiappah, 1998). Hazell, 2002 argues that the vicious circle can be broken when population pressure rises to the point such that the labor cost becomes cheap thereby increasing the agricultural yield and improvement of natural resources. Population growth can be boon to economic as it increases the agricultural productivity and it is no longer associated with environmental degradation as said by the Neo-Malthusian theory. At a local scale growing population can lead to over cultivation and decline in soil fertility (Taylor 1992). Marginalization is one of the factor that can lead to socio-economic or environmental change in both developed and developing countries. The adverse impact of population growth and economic marginalization led to a negative downward spiral for poor communities along with poverty and environmental degradation. This resulted in overstress of resources, relocation of poorer sector, and change in land use, population growth, poverty and equalities. In lieu of the sustainable livelihoods approach for the poor, the aim of environmental management and policies is to help the poor to cope with vulnerabilities. This implies significant role of participation, empowerment and local-level decision making.

Why poor or the developing countries are blamed for the environmental degradation? Richer countries have its own share for contribution to environment. It is well known fact that economic activity promotes wealth creation. However, it is also true that it has negative effect on the environment. The machineries currently used in industrialized countries generate vast quantities of waste and contamination. Hence, it causes degradation to natural resources. These impacts are more severe when it is accompanied by demographic growth. Since population increases can lead to increases in energy consumption, as a result it is responsible for greater atmospheric pollution. Menz, et.al. 2004 discussed that acid rain is the serious concern in both Europe and United States over the past several decades. It has a serious effect on the aquatic ecosystem such as the loss of fish populations along with the acidification of inland water bodies and groundwater. In the United States, acid rain gained attention with the
