It may seem that the above-mentioned studies are in agreement, but a closer look at the data reveals that the results are not as straightforward as they appear. The first study, by Smith et al. (1998), found that the rate of genetic differentiation was higher in populations with high levels of gene flow, which is the opposite of what was expected. The second study, by Jones et al. (2000), found that the rate of genetic differentiation was higher in populations with low levels of gene flow, which is also the opposite of what was expected. The third study, by Brown et al. (2002), found that the rate of genetic differentiation was higher in populations with intermediate levels of gene flow, which is also the opposite of what was expected. These results suggest that the relationship between gene flow and genetic differentiation is more complex than previously thought.
