

Chapter 7 – INTRINSIC AND EXTRINSIC FACTORS AFFECTING OPERATIONAL PHYSICAL PERFORMANCE

Section 7.1 – INTRODUCTION

The preceding chapters in this report have addressed the performance of common military tasks. Performance has been dealt with in terms of physiological and fitness requirements and methods of training to achieve performance goals. This chapter will deal with factors outside the training realm that influence performance on these military tasks. These factors are either individual (intrinsic) or environmental (extrinsic) characteristics. In general, effects of these factors cannot be overcome completely by additional physical conditioning.

The intrinsic factors considered are age, gender, body dimensions, and genetics. The extrinsic factors that will be considered are effects of nutrition (including hydration), heat, cold, altitude, clothing, and extended operations. The sections in this chapter are intended to increase reader awareness that performance is not determined simply by training and execution. They are meant to be introductions rather than exhaustive coverage of fundamental concepts in each of the areas presented. The contributors hope you will find these presentations helpful and informative.
