

“The Black Cat” Notes

Edgar Allan Poe

The first thing the narrator tells us is that he doesn't “expect” us to believe the story he's about to write, or ask us to believe it. He says he'd have to be crazy to think we'll believe him – he can hardly believe it himself. Then he says he isn't crazy, and he isn't dreaming. He is, however, going to die the very next day, and he wishes to confess everything to set his story straight. His purpose in writing the story is to give “the world” the plain facts of “a series of mere household events” (read: “stuff that happened around the house”) that have caused him intense fear, extreme discomfort, and have actually “destroyed” him. He hopes that some reader can see that everything that happened, everything that the narrator makes such a big deal about, is really “nothing more than an ordinary succession of very natural causes and effects.”

Even as a kid, the narrator was thought to have an attitude of “docility and humanity.”

Vocabulary

Docility: submissive, easily managed or taught.

His friends even made fun of him because he was too nice (read: effeminate).

He loved animals, and his parents let him keep lots of pets; he spent most of his time taking care of them. His love of animals stayed with him even as he grew from a boy, to a man, and he felt a particularly deep connection with his “faithful and sagacious dog”. (“Sagacious” here means “clever” or “perceptive”.) While still a young man, the narrator got married. He tells us that he and his wife got along very well. In fact, she noticed how much he loved animals and bought him lots of them, including – “a cat”.

This was a big cat – black, and gorgeous, and “sagacious”. In fact, the cat was so smart and sensitive that the woman suggested that the cat might be a witch “in disguise” (as was a prevailing superstition). Of course, the woman was just kidding around. The narrator only mentions this because he now remembers it.

The cat's name is Pluto, and the man loved him dearly. Pluto loved the man, as well. In fact, the cat had to be kept from following the man out of the house. This loving relationship between man and cat continued for a few years.

Eventually, the man started drinking and suffered a personality change “for the worse,” and of which he is much ashamed. (The narrator doesn't say he started drinking – he says that his personality changed as a result of “the Fiend Intemperance.” “Intemperance” means any excessive behavior or habits. In Poe's time, the word was used to describe excessive drinking.) As the narrator drank more and more, he became a nastier character with each passing day. He
