Introduction

Anthropogenic disturbance of waterbird populations is a significant conservation issue and is often a key issue in the assessment of proposed developments near important waterbird sites. Waterbirds are also sensitive to disturbance from avian predators. While this may be considered a more natural form of disturbance, it can still have impacts on waterbird populations (Quinn 1997). It has also become an issue in some Irish planning cases when objections have been made to the proposed installation of Peregrine Falco peregrinus nesting facilities (as mitigation for loss of nesting habitat) close to important waterbird sites.

Harper's Island Wetlands is a nature reserve managed by BirdWatch Ireland, Cork County Council and the Glounthaune Community Association. It is located in the Glounthaune Estuary and Slattery Water estuarine complex in the northern part of Cork Harbour close to Fota Wildlife Park. It holds a mixture of lagoon, saltmarsh, and brackish grassland habitats, which are used by one of the largest waterbird roosts in Cork Harbour. This roost is frequently disturbed by hunting Peregrines, while other avian predators that occur frequently include Sparrowhawk Accipiter nisus, Buzzard Buteo buteo, Kestrel Falco tinnunculus and Merlin Falco columbarius.

In recent years, escaped Great White Pelicans Pelecanus onocrotalus have become a regular feature at Harper's Island Wetlands and other areas in Cork Harbour. This species is considerably larger than any of the regularly occurring raptors at Harper's Island Wetlands, while no pelican species co-occur with wintering waterbird populations in north-west Europe. This note documents the behavioural responses of the waterbird populations at Harper's Island Wetlands to this novel (in a north-west European context) form of avian disturbance. The descriptions of the responses in this note are based on my own observations, and observations reported to me by other observers.

Escaped Great White Pelicans from Fota Wildlife Park were first recorded at Harper's Island Wetlands in September/October 2015, with one bird present for at least four weeks. I did not record any observations of disturbance responses to this bird. However, while a new birdwatching hide had just been constructed, various teething issues meant that it did not provide good opportunities for extended observations of the waterbird roost.

2018

The next significant occurrence of Great White Pelicans was in the autumn of 2018, when up to three birds were at large for over two months, and regularly visited Harper's Island Wetlands. By this stage, the development of the hide had been completed and it was open to the public, so much more detail about the occurrence of the pelicans in Harper's Island Wetlands, and their effects on the waterbirds, could be collected.

On my first observations of the pelicans during this period, on 8 September 2018, there were over 3,000 waterbirds roosting in Harper's Island Wetlands, including 1,253 Black-tailed Godwits Limosa limosa, 767 Black-headed Gulls Larus ridibundus, 429 Redshanks Tringa totanus and 410 Oystercatchers Haematopus ostralegus. After the roost had assembled, two pelicans appeared, repeatedly circling around overhead. On their first appearance, all the roosting waterbirds immediately flushed, with many briefly resettling
