

"We gotta take care of our baby chickens."

Breaking Bad is a gritty, graphically explicit look at the world of transnational crystal meth production. It is not for all audiences (especially children), but the writers have chosen a theme that is fitting for all to learn. In a flashback scene, Hector Salamanca, a cut-throat character of the show, tells one of his child family members, "La familia es todo" (Spanish for "Family is everything."). As ugly as the show's content can get, each and every character is motivated by their love for family. I am a classroom teacher who values my family above everything else, and while I won't stoop to creating and selling crystal meth to assist them (as the main character—who is also a teacher!—chooses to do so), I will do what I have to do to make sure that they and my descendants are well taken care of.

I don't have children yet, but I do have a niece named Lily. I learned of Lily in November 2012 when my brother and his girlfriend told me that I was going to be her tío (Spanish for "uncle"). I remembered that my mother told me years ago that her greatest regret was that she didn't open a savings account for my brother and me. Unfortunately, my brother and I suffered from the repercussions of that decision at times, so I used the memories of those pains as the basis of my decision to open up a savings account for Lily. For each day that she existed, I deposited a penny; when she was born her first day, I put 1¢. When she was alive for two days, I put 2¢, and so on, and so forth. Those small numbers keep adding up and adding up, and I hope to have a staggering amount of money saved up for her to use wisely when she graduates from high school in seventeen years.

Lily is the only descendant I have right now, but I will do the same thing I did for her if other ones come into being. I will never forget what one former coworker told me after she helped me set up my classroom when I was a brand new teacher. Her name is Maria Zuriga, and I was surprised to find out that she was actually my cousin! I told her "thank you very much" after I realized that she had helped me connect multiple computers in my classroom as well as my audio/visual equipment. She just smiled at me, and as she walked away, she said, "We gotta take care of our baby chickens." Amen to that.
